Although he composed at least a half dozen operas and some orchestral and chamber works, he is remembered almost entirely for the 36 solo songs that were first published in 1918 as 36 Arie di Stile Antico. The title might have been chosen because there is scarcely a hint of the pervasive dissonance or rhythmic daring of modern music.

Does Donaudy's "36 arie di stile antico" constitute a song cycle, or are they just a collection of songs arranged by the publisher? Recmusic.org lists them as a "song cycle", but a competition to which I'm applying has called that into question. I would appreciate any input from people with knowledge on this matter.
